ABSTRACT

This study aims to find emotional expressions in the Twitter account “Feelings Hurt”. In general, we know that emotions can be analyzed from facial expressions. The study of expressing emotions is always evolving and has many different points of view. According to Wilce "Emotions are a complex collection of chemical and neural responses that form patterns of behavior. typical". However, in today's era, studies in expressing emotions can be found in linguistic studies or from the point of view of language, it can be explained that expressing emotions can be done with various words as emotional expressions, either literally or not. as figuratively. This study aims to find emotional expression and analyze Tweets based on an approach to emotion.

Parrot (2001) categorizes three structured lists of basic emotions. The process of expressing emotion is indeed influenced by the environment. Sometimes an environment accepts its members if they laugh out loud, but there is also an environment that refuses and forbids its members from laughing to disturb other people. For this study, the writer uses some concepts from Wierzbicka (1995), Kovecses (2002), Fiehler (2002), and, Leech(2010) that emotions can be communicated verbally through the use of words. In doing research writer would like to use qualitative methods. The data source for this research is Tweets from a Twitter account with the name “Feelings Hurt”. After the researcher coding and collected the data, the researcher analyzed and interpreted the data in the table using Parrot's theory.

In this research on language and emotion, the researcher discovered many sorts of emotions contained in the Twitter account “Feelings Hurt”. These sorts of emotions incorporate love, happiness, anger, sadness, and fear, and the researcher additionally discovered two different ways to communicate emotion, they're literal and non-literal.
